Rental housing issues are a hot topic among policymakers, due to the COVID-19 pandemic and its attendant eviction moratoria and rent freezes, the housing supply shortage for those looking to buy, and a dramatic increase in inflation.

NAR knows the importance of available and affordable rental housing for future homeowners, and also understands the complicated system of rights and responsibilities that housing providers and their residents have toward each other, governed by the lease contract and state and local regulations which are enforced by the judicial system. The federal government does also have a role in rental housing, in the form of its many grants and programs to support affordable rental housing for low-income residents, such as the Section 8 Housing Choice Voucher program. NAR supports improvements to these programs and reducing barriers to new construction and opposes federal overreach which will needlessly complicate the existing patchwork of laws and regulations.

NAR provides resources and information to state and local REALTOR® associations to aid them in their advocacy against policies that threaten property rights, such as rent control, and in support of solutions to the affordable housing shortage.
